Management of Manages.

Not many years ago many farmers declared that manure in a heap paid better than money drawing ten per cent. interest. As a rule, no manure was applied to land until it was thoroughly decomposed. It was generally hauled to the field where it was to be applied and placed in heaps, to ferment and rot. The manure made in the winter was drawn out in the spring and allowed to remain in heaps till the time of corn planting the next season. This practice is now generally abandoned, except when the manure is wanted for a few special purposes, as for raising flowers or certain kinds of vegetables. Scientific men, as well as practical farmers, agree in thinking that manure loses its value by being exposed to the action of eral condition is not improved. By storing manure the use of it is lost one year, and much of its substance is wasted. A large part is was washed away by the rains, and a considerable portion is carried away by evaporation. During the process of decomposition considerable ammonia is formed, which is diffused in the atmosphere, and is lost for all practical purposes, unles gypsum of sulphuric acid is employed to retain it. By the spring, the ammonia that is formed is absorbed by the soil above it, and taken up by the plants as soon as they commence to grow. There is a great saving of time and labor in hauling manure directly to and by scattering it where it is wanted. The best farmers no longer suffer manure to accumulate about their barns and stables. They haul it out during favorable weather in winter, using sleds for the purpose when the ground is covered with snow. There is no injury to grass fields by drawing sleds over them when the ground is frozen, and very large loads can be taken all such times .-Chicago Times
